

The Public Interest and the Making of American Public Policy: 1965-2005

November 30–December 1, 2006

Computer Science 104

The James Madison Program in American Ideals and Institutions at Princeton University is pleased to bring together distinguished scholars to examine the impact of The Public Interest on U.S. policy in a range of areas during the 40-year life of the publication. The Public Interest was a quarterly journal founded in 1965 by Irving Kristol and Daniel Bell, with Nathan Glazer replacing Bell as co-editor in 1976. Its publication committee included Francis Fukuyama, Charles Krauthammer, William Kristol, Charles Murray and George Will. The final issue was printed April 25, 2005. Included among the many prominent contributors published by the magazine were James Q. Wilson, Charles Murray, Irwin Stelzer, Daniel P. Moynihan, Glenn C. Loury, and David Brooks. The journal provided a forum for the publication of many influential ideas for economic, educational, and social policy reform. It was aimed at a readership that consisted of journalists, scholars and policy makers. The journal at various times has focused on issues such as social security, globalization, welfare reform, tax reform, the culture wars, the state of the underclass and the salaries of the overclass.